

Managing multiple teams across a multi-project workload?

Need to improve utilization and collaborate more effectively?

The challenge is to optimize the usage of your teams, when each project has its own priority, timeline and skills requirements

Resource Management tools to increase productivity

Managing multiple projects with a limited pool of resources can be an exciting ride. You've just got your skills capacity nicely in balance with the demand when a new project arrives, creating unexpected bottlenecks.

Striking the right balance on resourcing levels is not easy. Whilst there must be sufficient spare resource to plug any gaps as they appear, too many just sitting on the bench will cause utilisation levels to fall and operational profits evaporate.

As new project plans are approved, requests for resource must be satisfied in a timely manner. Whatever your resource allocation process, collaboration between project and resource managers must be effective if individual projects are not to suffer.

With the project resourced and work underway, the prudent project manager will want early warning of cost or schedule overruns. Simply comparing the time spent with the approved plan isn't really good enough; an assessment of what's been achieved (the earned value) must also be made if forecasting the remaining work is to be realistic.

And any change to a project plan can cause new resource bottlenecks!

If this scenario strikes a chord, then please contact us. Innate has been helping project and services organizations get to grips with these resourcing issues for more than 20 years.
